The U.S. Medal of Honor

Medal of Honor for 1862-1897 shown

The Medal of Honor is the most prestigious decoration for U.S. military personnel who exhibit courage and self-sacrifice beyond the normal call of duty. In 1990, Congress established March 25 as National Medal of Honor Day. Creation of the medal, though, dates back to the Civil War. (Army than during any other period in U.S. history! Of these, 1,198 have been awarded to soldiers, including 25 Black soldiers, and 324 to sailors. The total also includes one female, Dr. Mary Walker, even though the medal was not intended for non-combatants. We may even consider some acts for which these medals were presented as unexceptional by modern views. For instance, medals were often awarded to flag bearers. During the Civil War, flag bearing was not just a patriotic act, but a necessary and deadly duty. The colorful banners were essential for identification and communication during battle but also made their bearers targets. Moreover, regimental flags were usually provided by a unit's local community. So, loss of the flag could lead to confusion in battle as well as shame and loss of pride.

In December 1861, President Abraham Lincoln signed a bill authorizing a medal of honor for Navy personnel. This was followed by a medal for Army personnel in July 1862. To date, there have been 1,532 Medals of Honor awarded to Civil War participants— more

The Confederate Roll of Honor

Like the U.S. Army, the Confederate Army consisted primarily of volunteer soldiers. As such, many political and military leaders felt it was more important than ever to recognize "conspicuous [...] courage and good conduct on the field of battle." General Robert E. Lee, though, reportedly opposed the idea. Nevertheless, Confederate Congress approved President Jefferson Davis authorizing creation of a medal of honor for Southern soldiers in October 1862. No medal was ever authorized for sailors. With limited resources and manufacturing capabilities focused on the war effort, however, no medals were ever minted. Instead, Samuel Cooper, the Adjutant and Inspector General for the Confederate Army, established the Confederate Roll of Honor in October 1863.

One-third of Civil War medals were awarded decades after the war. Originally, there was no time limit between the act of valor and the awarding of the medal. There was also no clear procedure for recommending a recipient. As the 19th-century concluded and the medal became more widely known, aging Union veterans wrote to the Adjutant General's Office requesting it. As such, more than 500 medals were awarded between 1891 and 1897. In 1896, though, President McKinley established new policies that became effective in June 1897 and required nominations be submitted by someone other than the potential recipient and include testimony by an eyewitness. The nomination also had to occur within one year of the act of valor. The latter restriction is not retroactive to engagements prior to 1897. Consequently, Lt. Alonzo H. Cushing, who was killed at Gettysburg, was posthumously awarded the medal in 2014. Over the years, other changes have occurred to the policies and appearance of the medal to ensure that it remains the U.S. Government's most noble military decoration.

Confederate soldiers were included on the Roll of Honor via the votes of their comrades. After an engagement, soldiers could nominate comrades from their companies for the Roll of Honor. The entire company then voted, and the nominee with the most votes had his name listed in battle reports, read aloud to regiments, and published in Southern newspapers.

The first Roll of Honor was published in November 1863 and included soldiers who distinguished themselves at Murfreesboro, TN in July 1862, Chancellorsville, VA in May 1863, and Gettysburg, PA in July 1863. Publications in August and December 1864 included the names of soldiers who fought heroically in other battles. The Roll of Honor was never retroactive, however, to engagements on the Virginia Peninsula in 1862.

Since 1977, Confederate veterans who "distinguished themselves conspicuously by gallantry, bravery, and intrepidity at the risk of life, above and beyond the call of duty" may be posthumously awarded a Confederate Medal of Honor created and minted by the Sons of Confederate Veterans (SCV). Over 60 such medals have been awarded to date, and many recipients come from the former Confederate Rolls of Honor. Only members of the SCV can submit candidates for the medal to the SCV's Confederate Medal of Honor Committee. A complete record on the nominee and documented proof of his deed of valor are required with the application. Medals for approved recipients are presented to institutions that agree in writing to display them publicly and to maintain their safety.
